BOLD BROOKLYN BURGLARS.

Mrs. Street Arsoned from Slumber and Told to "Keep Mum."

Brooklyn, apparently, is a favorite resort for thieves, not to say burglars, and the better the neighborhood the more industries the criminals. Ever since the famous Weeks murder there have been frequent reports of breaking and entering houses in Brooklyn and such work as the police have done has not apparently discouraged the operators. It has been said that there are not enough police in Brooklyn to guard the city; that the beats of the patrolmen are out of all proportion to an ordinary man's walking ability, and that lawless men take unfair advantage of this fact. The police are not to blame, and Brooklyn is nevertheless thriving flourished.

The burglars go usually no further than the basement of a house. There are many ways of getting into a house, and other than the thieves have to do is climb over fences and pry up rear basement windows with Jimmies. In the case of the recent break-in during the night was before daylight yesterday morning at 539 Pacific street. It is a brownstone house occupied by Mrs. Mary H. Switzer. The burglar cut through the front door and the house by cutting a hole out of a basement window. Appearance in the morning indicated that a round and had broken up a wood deal or booty which sub-suebly they were obliged to abandon. Then one of the burglars went to the house of Mrs. J. A. Street, a married daughter of Mrs. Switzer. There he struck a match and the noise awoke Mrs. Street, who was in bed, and she ran across the room, leaping over her bureau drawers. She exclaimed, "Who is there?" The burglar proceeded to stalk across the room, lean over the bureau, and laid hands on her. "Then more of us and you'd better keep quiet." Then the burglar went to a door and rang it. Frank, two or three times in a loud whisper. After he went down stairs and Mrs. Street summoned her brother, who got up and rang a bell outside, but the burglar had already gone. The burglar came, but there were no signs of the burglars other than the opened windows and the noise of the noise. The police were called and nothing was taken away. It was a pair of gold braelets which had not been found by the family yesterday morning. The police are looking for the thief, but he has not been found.
